Take help of the mechanic you or your friend can trust. Tell the independent mechanic that you are considering purchasing the vehicle, and have them check everything out and jot down on paper any problems they may find. If anything suspicious turns up, ask for a repair estimate. If the problem sounds too complex or too expensive to deal with, don't buy the car. Look for rust, particularly at the bottoms of fenders, around lights and bumpers, on splash panels, under doors, in the wheel wells, and under trunk carpeting. Small "blisters" may indicate future rust sites. Check for paint that does not quite match, gritty surfaces, masking body problems. Look for cracks, dents, and loose bumpers-warning signs of a past accident. Uneven wear on the front tires usually indicates either bad alignment, or front suspension damage. Do not forget to check the condition of the spare tire. Look for a close fit and ease of opening and closing. A door that fits unevenly may indicate that the car was involved in a collision. Look for hairline cracks and tiny holes. Black, gummy soot in the tailpipe may mean worn rings, or bad valves, and expensive repairs. Lean hard on a corner of the car and release; if the car keeps rocking up and down, the shocks may need replacing. Oil that is a whitish color, or has white bubbles, can be a sign of major mechanical problems. Check the radiator fluid; it should not look rusty. With the engine idling, check the transmission fluid; it should not smell rancid, or look dark brown. Check for leaks and stains under the car, on the underside of the engine, and around hoses and valve covers. Make sure all headlights, taillights, brake lights, backup lights, and direction signals work properly. Test the radio, heater, air conditioner, and windshield wipers. Check the upholstery for major wear and tear; do not forget to look under floor mats and seat covers. Check the steering wheel; unlocked, with the engine off, it should have no more than two inches of "play." A car with low mileage, but with a lot of wear on the driver's seat or the brake and accelerator, may indicate tampering with the odometer. A musty smell inside the vehicle could mean that the car was damaged in a flood, or that rain leaks inside the car. Emissions tests may also warn you of impending costs. If a car catalytic converter is emitting borderline levels of hydrocarbons, the catalytic converter may soon need to be replaced. High emissions could be due to cracked or worn valve seals, malfunctioning fuel injectors, a bad oxygen sensor, clogged fuel filter, improper timing, or an indication that the previous owner simply did not take good care of the car by performing regular oil changes. In the worst case, the engine might need to be completely overhauled.

Or simply, Choose to buy Certified Used Car from us.
